In this proposal, we will determine the mechanism underlying Nrf2-mediated induction of multidrug resistance in P-gp+ cancer cells. Our preliminary data suggest that Nrf2-targeted cancer therapy may improve the efficacy of chemotherapy. To directly test this hypothesis, we will test the following 3 major hypotheses: (1) Nrf2 increases the expression of P-gp+ cancer cells; (2) Nrf2-induced P-gp+ cancer cells is mediated by increased transcription of the human MDR1 gene; and (3) Nrf2 increases the cytotoxicity of anticancer drugs. In Aim 1, we will determine the mechanisms underlying Nrf2-mediated P-gp+ cancer cell proliferation by: a) characterizing the role of Nrf2 in P-gp+ cancer cells; b) determining if the human MDR1 gene is a major target of Nrf2 in P-gp+ cancer cells; and c) identifying the specific region of the human MDR1 promoter responsible for Nrf2-mediated induction of the human MDR1 gene. In Aim 2, we will determine the mechanisms by which Nrf2 regulates the human MDR1 gene in P-gp+ cancer cells. In Aim 3, we will determine the relationship between Nrf2 and the cytotoxicity of anticancer drugs. In Aim 3.1, we will determine the effect of Nrf2 on the cytotoxicity of drugs in P-gp+ cancer cells and P-gp- cancer cells. In Aim 3.2, we will determine whether cancer patients with high Nrf2 expression have lower survival after anticancer drug treatments. In Aim 3.3, we will
