The growing scientific and popular interest in the question of aging has been accompanied by a proliferation of investigations intended to characterize old age as a specific and distinct process, leading to the end of life. We suggest an alternative approach, in which aging is viewed as a gradual process with increasing severity across the life span. The characteristic features of aging are not discrete traits, but age-related changes that are caused by cumulative influences and accumulate with increasing age. The severity of the process increases with age, but different age classes differ in their severity. The differences in severity between different age classes can be usefully represented by numbers (2, 4, 6, etc.) that indicate how much the severity of aging increases with each year of life.Ohio State's decision to rename a fire station has fueled online firestorms and the anger of a former firefighter
