By using electron microscopy, we have examined the distribution of adhesins and fibronectin on the surface of gastric epithelial cells in human autopsy specimens obtained from a patient with H. pylori infection. The specimens were incubated in suspension with either culture supernatant (SN) or cell-free sonicated cell extract (CE) of the H. pylori reference strain NCTC 11637. When gastric mucosal specimens from non-infected patients were incubated with SN, CE, or both, we found that the adhesive activity of SN was neutralized by anti-lipopolysaccharide antibody, whereas those of CE remained intact. The adhesins on the surface of gastric epithelial cells were associated with a fibrillar or fibrous matrix, but were not confined to the location of invagination of the microvilli. The fibrillar adhesive material was composed of long filaments which appeared to be interconnected through a network. Both anti-adhesin antibody and anti-fibronectin antibody reacted with these filaments. Although the fibronectin matrix was abundantly distributed on the surface of the cells, its distribution was distinct from that of the adhesins. In addition to the fibrous matrix, the surface of epithelial cells was also densely covered with loose matrix. The adhesins 595f342e71
